level of knowledge about the environment than the elementary sensory impressions alone could ever provide. The third consists of the motor controls and skills which permit the individual to undertake to alter his physical environment by active means. As one would expect, these functions are interrelated rather than separated from one another.

The drives, of course, we assume to be present from birth, but the same is certainly not true of interest in or control of the environment on the one hand, nor of any moral sense or aspirations on the other. It is obvious, therefore, that neither of the latter, that is, neither the ego nor the superego develops till sometime after birth.
