Cuttlefish, like other cephalopods, have sophisticated eyes. The organogenesis and the final structure of the cephalopod eye fundamentally differ from those of vertebrates such as humans. Superficial similarities between cephalopod and vertebrate eyes are thought to be examples of convergent evolution. The cuttlefish pupil is a smoothly curving W-shape.

La respiración implica introducir agua a la cavidad paleal a través de una abertura, pasarla a través de las branquias y expulsarla a través del sifón. La entrada de agua se logra mediante la contracción de los músculos radiales de la pared del manto y las válvulas de las aletas branquiales se cierran cuando los fuertes músculos circulares expulsan el agua a través del sifón.
